MONTHLY REVIEW

Global stock markets have performed well during November as a result of good business performance and improved economic conditions. Although the economic and geopolitical situation remains difficult, inflation in the US and several European countries continues to show a trend of moderation. In general, we can say that expectations begin to swing towards optimism rather than towards pessimism as the trend had been. On the central bank side, the FED's latest speech shows a much less harsh tone than previous ones, implying that rate hikes could be more moderate from now on because inflation seems to have shifted.

Regarding the portfolio, we have started a position in Gerresheimer, a leading German company in the manufacture of packaging for the pharmaceutical sector of both glass and plastic, as well as inhalers, pens for insulin, vials and syringes. The new management team launched a new strategic plan in 2019 focused on growth (+6/+9% per year through 2025) and efficiency improvement with significant investments already beginning to show results with double-digit increases both in sales and profit.

On the sell side, we have sold the entire position in the French technology consultancy company Aubay that we owned in our portfolio since 2020. This is an excellent company, but after the increase during the last few weeks the price has adjusted to our valuation level. We have also sold the entire position in the Swiss pharmaceutical company Roche that we had in our portfolio since 2018. The disappointment in the recently announced Alzheimer's drug (Gantenerumab) has been a major setback for the company. This resolution has recently been added to several additional disappointments in studies that were already in phase III and that make us more cautious with the company's evolution over the next few years. This is an excellent company, but we see more potential in other companies in the health sector like Fresenius in which we have been gaining weight in recent weeks.
