MONTHLY REVIEW

The month of October started negatively for Europe given the escalation of the conflict in the Middle East and ended badly due to the fear that Trump, as later confirmed, could win the American elections. Stock markets perceive that Europe is the one that loses the most with Trump's victory. Nevertheless, once the Trump effect has been discounted, the economy and central banks' movements must guide again the evolution of stock markets. In the US, rate cuts should slow down following the strong appreciation in the US dollar and the outlook of higher debt and fiscal deficits. In Europe, on the other hand, a weak euro and central bank accelerating rate cuts should partially offset any tariffs the US puts on its imports. As for Asia, strong stimulus in China announced during the last month, begin to be reflected positively in indicators of activity such as industrial production and consumption.

Earnings season is finalizing, leaving us with a bittersweet taste with better evolution in the US vs Europe where the economic slowdown has been noticed more sharply even though earnings have grown around 6% during Q3. On the upside, companies are starting to see signs of recovery in China and a robust American economy.

On the sentiment side, investors are extremely bullish towards the American market at a time when valuations are once again reaching historically high levels and interest rates are not going to fall as previously estimated. On the other hand, in Europe negativism is maximum and there is no big allocation by global investors. Voices within the European Union that speak of the need to reform, deregulate, unify... are getting stronger. The call for earlier elections in Germany would be in line with this perception.

As for the portfolio, we sold the position in the Spanish real estate developer Neinor Homes after rising 55% and reaching our target price in the year, given the strategic change by the excellent management team in search of a more profitable and less capital-intensive model. We have also sold the position in the French infrastructure company Vinci due to the higher regulatory risk in its core assets and the growth slowdown that we estimate for the coming quarters.
